

CORN WORMS AND OTHER SIMILAR PESTS.

The agricultural and horticultural papers are agitating the subject of the Corn Worm, Cut Worm, etc. Professor J. K. Street, an eminent authority on Entomology, has made a study of these pests for a number of years. He says:

"The Cotton Worm, the Aletia, is a diabolical insect, from the so called Bull Worm, the Heliothis; but they both belong to the Lepidoptera family and, of course, they partake somewhat of the same nature.

The Cotton Worm attacks only the cotton plant—his ravages are confined to it alone. He is a native of the South and he is confined to the cotton districts. He hibernates in the shape of a moth, in trash piles and in other warm places.

"The so-called Bull Worm is confined to no particular section; he is found in all parts of North America. He is known by different names in different localities. In the fruit growing states he is known as the Fruit Worm; in the horticultural district as the Tomato Worm, the Bean Worm and by various other names, according to the vegetable upon which he feeds; in the corn districts he is called the Corn Worm, and in the cotton districts the Bull Worm. He first appears as the Cat Worm and later on he is called the Silk and the Corn Worm. During the corn season from three to four broods are produced. He remains on the corn until it begins to barren, when he leaves it and attacks the cotton boll, confining himself exclusively to the fruit of the plant. One Bull Worm will destroy from ten to fifty bolls. He hibernates in the chrysalis state and always underground. He will live in this way through the Winter and survive the coldest weather."

It is evident that any means for the destruction of these pests must be based on their nature and habits. Professor Street is the author of a pamphlet on this subject which gives effective and inexpensive means for their destruction and free community from their ravages, which based upon a peculiar habit common to the entire Lepidoptera family of moths that produces these destructive insects. We will send a copy of this pamphlet to any address on receipt of 50 cents. The former or posterior may be freed from the ravages of all of the above named insects at a cost of from 25 cents to 1.00, depending upon the size of his garden or farm. Address all orders to this paper.
